"The idea was to mirror the forest in our design without disturbing it in our execution."
MARIE-CLAUDE HAMELIN, ARCHITECT

The paragon of geometry in the design is the large window, which is partially visible in the image above. It is a simple, clean-lined window that is set in a square-foot concrete foundation, which is partially visible in the image above. Language architect Susana Soares spent more than two years searching for an isolated weekend getaway, close to the home of architect. Even discovering the dreamy wooded area with an old timber-frame house in the Eastern Townships region in 2005, Soares says she "fell in love with the land and really began to wait the stack." No wonder. The rough-hewn structure had just one window and a patch of light blue floor. It had electricity, but no running water. It was also strewn with trees discarded by the builder who occasionally used it. It was, in short, "biggest," as she remembers.

Soares spent the next six years working on the building, which was constructed on a concrete slab measuring 400 square feet. She added windows, a main level, and a complete water and sewer system, including dead trees to clear out a view of the nearby mountains, doing nearly all of the work herself.

While Soares treasured the tiny home, it didn't allow much in the way of modern conveniences for rising friends. The site didn't want to expand beyond the home's 3
