

First Ladies' Power

Throughout history, First Ladies have been charged with traditional “female” roles, from planning the menu at state dinners to decorating the White House at Christmas.

5 When they're in the White House, First Ladies often focus their efforts around broadly supported, family-friendly issues, like literacy or nutrition. Their recent comments about family separation at the border¹, though
10 pointedly political, also fit with a First Lady's traditional focus on family issues.

But they also have a long tradition of being more outspoken than their husbands on key issues, even when they occupy the 15 same White House. [...] Eleanor Roosevelt supported an anti-lynching bill² that her husband was resisting. Barbara Bush visited babies with AIDS³ in 1989, her first year in the White House. Michelle Obama used
20 her 2016 Democratic National Convention

speech to popularize the phrase “When they go low, we go high” in reference to Donald Trump. Hillary Clinton used a 1995 speech in Beijing to declare that “Women's rights 25 are human rights.”

Without ever running for office or holding an official political position, First Ladies become among the most visible people in the country.

Hilary WEAVER, vanityfair.com,
June 20, 2018

▲ Michelle Obama and Hillary Clinton

- ◆ activist
- ◆ advocate (of)
- ◆ representative

- ◆ ardent /'ɑ:dənt/
- ◆ influential
- ◆ outstanding

- ◆ get involved in
- ◆ launch a project
- ◆ push for legislation
- ◆ take up/stand up for a cause

1. a part of President Trump's immigration policy
2. a bill to put an end to the lynching of black citizens
3. SIDA

First Ladies' Power

Throughout history, First Ladies have been charged with traditional “female” roles, from planning the menu at state dinners to decorating the White House at Christmas.

5 When they're in the White House, First Ladies often focus their efforts around broadly supported, family-friendly issues, like literacy or nutrition. Their recent comments about family separation at the border¹, though
10 pointedly political, also fit with a First Lady's traditional focus on family issues.

But they also have a long tradition of being more outspoken than their husbands on key issues, even when they occupy the 15 same White House. [...] Eleanor Roosevelt supported an anti-lynching bill² that her husband was resisting. Barbara Bush visited babies with AIDS³ in 1989, her first year in the White House. Michelle Obama used
20 her 2016 Democratic National Convention

speech to popularize the phrase “When they go low, we go high” in reference to Donald Trump. Hillary Clinton used a 1995 speech in Beijing to declare that “Women's rights 25 are human rights.”

Without ever running for office or holding an official political position, First Ladies become among the most visible people in the country.

Hilary WEAVER, vanityfair.com,
June 20, 2018

▲ Michelle Obama and Hillary Clinton

- ◆ activist
- ◆ advocate (of)
- ◆ representative

- ◆ ardent /'ɑ:dənt/
- ◆ influential
- ◆ outstanding

- ◆ get involved in
- ◆ launch a project
- ◆ push for legislation
- ◆ take up/stand up for a cause

1. a part of President Trump's immigration policy
2. a bill to put an end to the lynching of black citizens
3. SIDA

